Native Land
 The Tattaviam call this region home.

The Tattaviam migrated to the Santa Clara Valley from the Great Basin more than 1,000 years ago. Traditional Tattaviam territory included Northern and Eastern San Francisco Valley, Santa Clara, Acton, Agua Dulce, Southern Alameda Valley, and Capital Junction.

For the Tattaviam, Mission Canyon was fertile hunting and gathering ground. They harvested acorns, berries, roots, shrubs, seeds, and other food, with earth, grain, flowering stalks, bones, and animals. They trapped and hunted game-meat animals like rabbits and squirrels, and larger ones like deer. Mission Canyon also provided essential raw materials for making sandals, baskets for weaving baskets, and yellow warblers and muskrat for building children's and toys.

These resourceful people bartered with neighboring tribes: the Kitanemuk, Klamath people of the mountains, or the Serrano, greater Chumash, Shoshonean people of the Inland Empire, and Klamath people of the coast. Today the Serranoan and Klamath are referred to as the Tattaviam.

They lived and worked in the region, each relying on their trading network to enrich their culture. Based in Los Angeles and the San Gabriel Valley, these tribes strive to preserve their cultural heritage, gathering for traditional ceremonies at sacred places such as Mission Banks.
